

To whom it may concerned,

According to the economic and social points, I do realize that the visa capping is unreasonable and not good to this country.

First, it is unfair to say that those new immigrants led Australia local unemployment. New immigrants and those waiting for the technique of migrants mainly engaged in the service industry with the most toil and lowest paid work, which the local people do not want to do. If you lose this part of the labor force, you will have significant consequences. On the one hand, there will be the shortage of labor market, which will increase labor costs and the Government reduce revenues; on the other hand, the OZs enjoying the welfare of Australians are unwilling to engage in hard work, so that the Government may reduce welfare because the financial pressure and employment gaps. Then, lose ordinary labour support. As a result, the new immigration bill may not be able to alleviate the unemployment problem in Australia, but worse at all levels of dissatisfaction with the Government, or even possible to tighten up a meaningless loop of relax-tighten.

Secondly, I very much agree with the need to strengthen the international responsibility of Australia. However, I am not convinced that increasing political refugees quota is the very way to solve this problem. On the contrary, to increase skilled migration is the fundamental solution. From now on, most of the refugees will directly get government benefits, they are not willing to go to work. Also, their English and job skills require government-funded training. This greatly increases the social burden. At the same time, the skilled migration, in either a project that has a direct service to Australian society, also they can contribute to pay taxes, and to the community. What's more, the basis of economy is the only power for a country to talk about the so-called international responsibility.

I have lived in Australia for two years. I think this is a liberal free country. But the new Immigration Bill made me suspect that the Government of issues and problem solving skills. It must be a very incompetence and failure of the measures that ask the immigrants to take the business of unemployment and economic pressure.
