Senate Select Committee on COVID-19

Australian Government's response to the COVID-19 pandemic

13 May 2020

PDR Number: IQ20-000225

Question Subject: Sufficient PPE and training in Australia

Type of Question: Written

Senator: Katy Gallagher

Question:

When the COVID pandemic hit Australia was there sufficient PPE and training providing in its use in Australia?

a. And what about in Tasmania, particularly in NW Tasmania?

Answer:

The National Medical Stockpile (NMS) is a strategic reserve of drugs, vaccines, antidotes and personal protective equipment for use in the national response to a public health emergency and exists to supplement holdings of state and territory health authorities to support continuity of service provision. The commencement of the COVID-19 pandemic prompted the Government to significantly increase the range and quantity of its personal protective equipment (PPE) holdings.

The Tasmanian Government requested access to the NMS (for the purposes of COVID-19) on 24 March 2020, 17 April 2020, 4 May 2020 and 12 May 2020.

The Department of Health is aware of regional and international shortages of PPE, particularly in the early stages of the COVID-19 pandemic. The initial concern related to the provision of masks has now been addressed with substantial purchases by the NMS, states and territories and the private market. The Department is managing national and international shortages of required PPE products and is providing supplies of available products, primarily PPE, to frontline healthcare workers.

As at 7am 17 June 2020, more than 921,000 people have completed the Department of Health's Infection Control Training module. This includes more than 137,000 people working in aged care, 69,000 in disability care, and 56,000 primary care workers.
