Acland mine deal put on hold following scandal

DEVELOPMENT of a coal mine at the centre of a donations scandal that engulfed the Newman government during the Queensland election campaign has been put on hold by federal Environment Minister Greg Hunt.

As Mr Hunt extended the deadline to decide on the Acland Stage Three mine under the Environmental Protection and Biodiversity Act, fresh questions were raised about whether the federal Liberal Party was used to conceal donations to the state's Liberal National Party. Electoral commission records show $3.38 million was sent from the federal party to the state LNP in 2013-14.

Although it is not unusual for federal funds to be sent to states during an election year, opponents of the mine, on Queensland's Darling Downs, said the transfer could include hundreds of thousands of dollars of donations made on behalf of the mine's owner, New Hope, to the federal party.

Federal Liberal Party director Brian Loughnane said the party complied "scrupulously" with all requirements of the Electoral Act. "We are audited annually by the commission," he said.

Brickworks, an associated company of New Hope's parent, WH Soul Pattinson, was linked in NSW corruption hearings last year to improper donations made through the federal Liberal Party's Free Enterprise Foundation to the NSW Liberal Party.

There is no suggestion the donations made by WH Soul Pattinson on behalf of New Hope were illegal or improper, but they coincided with the Newman government breaking an election promise not to allow the mine expansion.

The expansion was approved as one of the last acts of the co-ordinator-general before the state election, and announced by Deputy Premier Jeff Seeney late on December 19. The LNP defended the decision, saying it had approved a scaled-down project.

Electoral commission records show donations of more than $900,000 over several years made by WH Soul Pattinson on behalf of New Hope, which has operations only in Queensland.

The latest records show the federal Liberal Party made four payments to Queensland's LNP in 2013-14 totalling $3.38m.

Opponents of the mine expansion said the party must say whether that included money from WH Soul Pattinson.

"Sending money to the federal party instantly disguises where it has come from," said John Gordon of the anti-coal group Stop Brisbane Coal Trains.

WH Soul Pattinson has declined to comment to The Australian about the donations.

Last year its associate company Brickworks was embroiled in Independent Commission Against Corruption hearings in NSW over the funnelling of donations through the federal Liberal Party to the state branch.

Some of the donations from WH Soul Pattinson on behalf of New Hope were declared by the Free Enterprise Foundation.

New Hope mine would raise flags at NSW anti-corruption body

THE New Acland mine's approval would warrant scrutiny from the Independent Commission Against Corruption if it happened in NSW, a former commissioner has said.

David Ipp, the ICAC commissioner who found former NSW Labor MPs Eddie Obeid and Ian Macdonald were involved in corrupt deals, was asked about the mine expansion after speaking yesterday at a Brisbane conference on accountability.

Anti-mining campaigner Drew Hutton asked Mr Ipp if the Darling Downs mine's approval, which allegedly followed more than $700,000 in donations to the Federal Liberal Party from New Acland owner New Hope, would raise red flags at ICAC.

"Yes," was Mr Ipp's only response.

While Mr Ipp said it would have been investigated he did not say the expansion was corrupt.

He noted throughout his previous speech how innocent donations could be explained with better political accountability processes.

In his question to Mr Ipp, Mr Hutton alleged the New Hope donation to the Liberal Party was sent back to the Queensland LNP.

However, he admitted this was just "scuttlebutt", claiming transferring donations from federal to state parties was "common practice".

Mr Hutton's Lock the Gate group, as well other anti-mining campaigners, claims the LNP back-flipped on promises not to approve the expansion after the donation.

The LNP has denied the claims, previously stating the expansion was approved after the proposal was changed, and maintaining the state party had not received such a big donation from the miner.

The New Acland mine expansion became an election issue after Sydney shock jock Alan Jones spoke about the approval on his Brisbane election specials.

Donors get mine approval 'on quiet'

GRAHAM LLOYD THE AUSTRALIAN JANUARY 12, 2015 12:00AM

A FINAL act of the Newman government before calling the Queensland state election was approval for a controversial coalmine development by a company that had donated $650,000 to the Liberal National Party.

Deputy Premier Jeff Seeney announced that the Co-ordinator-General had approved the Acland stage-three mine late on December 19 as business wound down for Christmas and in the wake of the Sydney siege and multiple stabbing murders in Cairns.

He said the $900 million project would create more than 250 jobs during construction and another 435 when in operation.

The Acland mine expansion still requires federal government approval and the issue of a mining licence but Mr Seeney said the Co-ordinator-General's decision was "a significant step towards construction of this mine".

The stage-three Acland development has dogged the Newman government since before the previous election, when it promised no approval would be given. After the poll, the LNP invited the company to submit a revised mining proposal.

The mine plan has faced vocal opposition — led by Sydney radio personality Alan Jones, who once lived in the area — because of the impact it would have on productive agricultural land on the Darling Downs.

Local opponent John Gordon, of environment group Stop the Brisbane Coal Trains, said the LNP had attempted to "bury" the news before Christmas because the government knew the deal would "fail the pub test".

Last year, SBCT released Australian Electoral Commission documents that showed the Acland mine's parent company, Soul Pattinson, had donated $650,000 to the LNP over three years.

These were marked as being on behalf of Acland mine owner New Hope.

The donations were made in three instalments, two of $200,000 and one of $250,000, in the lead-up to the company's submission of an environmental impact statement.

"The donations are not illegal but they fail the pub test on any measure," Mr Gordon said.

"The problem with the donations is they were made during the election period when local state member Seeney and Premier Campbell Newman were saying the Acland stage three mine would not go ahead.

"After the election they changed their story that New Hope would be allowed to resubmit plans for a smaller mine."

Mr Seeney said the reduced scope of the mine in response to local concerns was “a good example of a resource company working hard to achieve community confidence”.

He said the Newman government had not supported New Acland Coal's original 2007 expansion plan because of its effect on high-quality agricultural land and proximity to local townships.

“However, since 2012, the proponent has reduced the project's footprint by around 60 per cent and has relinquished 1401ha, or 28 per cent, of the mining lease area, including the town of Acland,” Mr Seeney said.

Mr Gordon said production from the mine would still increase from 4.4 million tonnes to 7.7 million tonnes a year.

Queensland election 2015: Palaszczuk 'will seek advice' on Acland

A QUEENSLAND Labor government would fully review the approval process and impact of the proposed expanded Acland coalmine west of Toowoomba should Annastacia Palaszczuk form government.

In exclusive comments to The Australian, a spokesman said the new government “would seek legal advice about the checks and balances ... carried out to approve the project”.

“It may be the case that further work needs to be done on both the government and proponent side to ensure the project stacks up environmentally, commercially, socially and otherwise,” he added.

The political fallout from Campbell Newman’s breaking of an election promise not to expand the mine could also impact on the federal government’s approval of the proposed expansion, due soon.

Environment Minister Greg Hunt is reviewing whether the expansion is consistent with federal environmental law.

The Acland decision, on the eve of the Liberal National Party calling the snap election, dogged the party throughout the campaign. Radio host Alan Jones and others have linked the decision to massive donations made by New Hope Coal’s owner WH Soul Pattinson to the federal Liberal Party.

In the wake of the election, the Australian Electoral Commission revealed that WHSP made a further $250,000 donation to the Liberal Party in 2013-14, lifting the total over four years to $900,000.

Industry Minister Ian Macfarlane, whose federal seat encompasses the mine, declined to answer questions on banning donations by developers, as did Liberal Party treasurer Philip Higginson and WHSP.

Cattle farmer Tanya Plant, who lives 2km from the mine's wash plant, said the approval risked the region's water resources and was contrary to state law on priority farmland.

The Co-ordinator-General's report said 357 registered bores would likely or possibly be affected, she said. "The project is also mapped entirely within a Priority Agricultural Area under Queensland's Regional Planning Interests Act 2012 and my understanding is it still doesn't have the approval it would require to impact on priority agricultural land uses," she said.

"I hope any government considering the further approvals ... doesn't rubber stamp this project."

Labor is compromised because it approved the first two stages of the mine. The third expansion, which would lift production to 7.5 million tonnes of coal a year, came about after the proponent agreed to scale back its plans.
