

Dear Sir/Madam,

Psychological services in Australia have become more effective in targeting and reaching the most vulnerable sector since the introduction of Medicare rebates for Psychological services.

Since the introduction of Medicare rebates for psychological services the Australian society has been better served by the psychologists in Australia. I would even be bold enough to state that - since the introduction of Medicare rebates for psychological services - Australia, as a whole has, has improved its level of psychological welfare.

Cutting back on Medicare benefits for psychological services to the Australian public appears to be counter-productive to the psychological health and wellbeing of our nation.

Please maintain or (even) increase those psychological services for the general public of Australia by maintaining (or increasing) the Medicare rebate system for psychological services in Australia.

For a happier and healthier Australia please do not limit Medicare rebates for psychological services in Australia.

Thank you.

Yours sincerely,

Graeme King (Registered psychologist)
