Senate Community Affairs References Committee

Report published: Accessibility and quality of mental health services in rural and remote Australia

Issue date: 5 December 2018

The Senate's Community Affairs References Committee has called for a national strategy on rural and remote mental health to address the low rates of access to mental health services and the tragically high rate of suicide in Australia's rural and remote communities.

The committee's report, tabled in the Senate and published yesterday, sets out the findings of the inquiry into the accessibility and quality of mental health services in rural and remote Australia and makes 18 recommendations to Government.

"Australians living in rural and remote communities are less likely to seek mental health treatment than their city dwelling counterparts. Tragically they're also twice as likely to die by suicide" said Committee Chair, Senator Rachel Siewert.

"What has been lacking to date is a mental health strategy specifically for rural and remote communities which takes into account the unique service environments and myriad of barriers to accessing quality mental health services in rural and remote Australia."

"One clear message came from rural and remote communities: their voices and experiences are not being listened to in service design and delivery. The committee has made several recommendations to put the needs of the community first and improve the accessibility and quality of mental health services in rural and remote communities."

"For Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples, cultural competency is as important as clinical competency. It is essential that the mental health workforce receive training and input from their local community to ensure their services are culturally appropriate" said Senator Siewert.

The committee received 138 submissions and held 16 public hearings, travelling across Australia to hear from people that live and work in rural and remote communities.
