Question:

Mr Borg: Let's be very clear: there's been no price gouging at Outback Stores. We have good processes in place where we manage our pricing all the time. We certainly placed more specific focus on that through COVID-19. In fact, we've seen our gross profits across our stores drop where we've actually brought pricing down. As a couple of examples: we were chasing items that were unavailable nationally, like hand sanitiser. We actually paid a higher price. That doesn't mean Outback Stores is price gouging; it means that we paid a higher cost price. In this example specifically, we sold that product at cost, and the stores that we manage made no profit on those items at all in trying to keep the price down. Outside of a couple of areas where availability was a struggle, we drove prices down significantly across the board to assist in this process.

Senator SIEWERT: How did you check that prices were what you said they should be?

Mr Borg: We get to see our prices regularly in our system and we get to manage weekly our price increases or decreases in our system. I can reflect, take it on notice and provide documentation that shows that we weren't increasing any prices outside of our standard processes through the COVID-19 period.

Answer:

Pricing is controlled centrally from Outback Stores' Support Office dedicated team through a software called group controller which is integrated with store's point of sale system.

There is no manual input on sell prices by unauthorised users in the system on individual lines to adjust pricing outside of the standard mark-up structures in use across all OBS stores other than price reductions on either staple products or price reductions on targeted lines.

Cost prices are applied through weekly information from various suppliers, these costs are then loaded into the pricing system and the sell prices are automatically calculated using the variables such as freight, cost and standard mark-up on each commodity group. Standard mark-ups were increased due to COVID-19 impacts. It should be noted that some cost prices might have increased due to supply demand challenges as witnessed across the country, however these were limited to only few products.

We have further safeguarded our pricing by removing the ability of store managers or store staff to adjust pricing in stores.

This allows us to ensure the prices we see in the Group Controller system at support office align correctly with the prices on display at the stores and no changes can be made by unauthorised users.
