

To the Selection of Bills Committee,

The government by providing indemnity to pharmaceutical companies claims liability for products from the pharmaceutical companies. However, the government is an institution of people not an artificial body. It is the members of government whom really claim the responsibility taken away from pharmaceutical companies. These people whom occupy positions in the government therefore can be trialled in a court of law for their responsibilities.

It is necessary to protect those in government from the responsibility of products from a pharmaceutical company. If we do not protect our members of government we are simply weakened and vulnerable. This is a national security issue.

Kind regards,

Ty Lackmann