Senator Kristina Keneally asked:

On Thursday 24 September 2020, the Department indicated at the COVID-19 Select Committee that while it is aware of the number of passengers on each flight flying into Australia, it can not provide data on the availability of first, business, economy class seats.

- a. Why did the Department not start collecting this data so that the Government would have accurate data to understand the availability of economy seats for Stranded Australians to return home?
- b. Does the Department have any other available data to indicate the availability of economy seats for Stranded Australians to return home?
- c. Will the Department now start collecting this data so that Australians can have confidence that economy seats are available for Stranded Australians to return home?

Answer:

The Department does not collect information on tariffs (airfares), and most of Australia's bilateral air services agreements include a provision that filing of such information shall not be required.

The availability of seats into Australia is constrained by caps put in place on inward passenger numbers at the request of State and Territory Governments and as agreed by the National Cabinet.
