Subject: 1998 Statute for an International Criminal Court

Re - Joint Standing Committee on Treaties

Dear Sir,

As a private citizen, I wish to indicate my objection to the consideration of any overseas proposal that will be binding on the citizens of Australia. Our elected representatives are responsible for internal issues that effect their electors. But, any issue that ties us to international agreements should be first agreed to, or rejected by, all citizens per medium of a referendum.

An International Criminal Court should not over ride the authority of own institutions. Nor should the citizens of this country be bound to decisions made by any external authority, whose recognition of our common law rights are suspect. I urge the Committee to reject this proposal.

Yours sincerely

Australia should not be party to the Statute of International Criminal Code because:

1. It overrides Australian sovereignty:

Australia (the government), rejected appeals to the Privy Council in order to end jurisdiction by "foreign" authorities. It is therefore hypocritical and a reversal of existing policy of independent sovereignty. It is not in the best interests of the Australian people to transfer sovereignty to an alien, foreign power. The parliament does not have the peoples' authority for such a transfer of judicial sovereignty.

To transfer sovereignty to a foreign power could only be lawful following a referendum of the population.

2. Should Australia become a party to this Code:

It would place all Australians under the control of a foreign, alien power without their individual knowledge or authority, and it would place all Australians under an authority over which they could not possibly have proper democratic influence....and it would place all Australians under an authority that will be concerned more about the interests of more powerful nations than it would be about Australians.... and Australians would have no reasonable or democratic control over future developments of the Code.

3. Should Australia become party to this Code:

All persons involved in the support of such involvement will have committed an act of treason against the Australian people for which they will be held fully accountable.
