

23 February 2011

Once again the thought police are questioning those who think multiculturalism is a bad thing.

This action is highly political and has no thought for the future of this country.

Do you want to turn Australia into another Bosnia?

Those that fail to learn from the lessons of history are bound to repeat them.

Bosnia witnesses that people, who show how great multiculturalism is, can suddenly violently polarize and then we have some not very nice people as leaders rising to the top and creating carnage.

Already in Europe we have signs of coming catastrophe.

In a few years there will be more Moslems in Holland than Dutch people. Guess what's going to happen then.

Are we smarter than Angela Merkel or Gordon Brown?

I think not.

Australia always follows the trend in these places 2 or 3 years down the track.

Bear in mind that your decisions, not those of ordinary Australians will be responsible for Australia's future. If your decisions cause things go wrong you will all run away and hide, and ordinary people, those who you are supposed to be representing will bear the brunt, but you will not escape either. The so-called "Gay " people and women could be really affected, as well as everyone else. It surprises me that people who lead these political parties, who fall into these categories, want to promote it.

Multiculturalism is an experiment that can go dreadfully wrong

If you really want to know what Australians think of multiculturalism, give them a vote on it, or would that just be too democratic.

Thank you for allowing me to exercise my democratic right.

Sincerely yours, W B