Answer:

1574. The Australian Prudential Regulation Authority (APRA) has made no change to its policy on staff access to social media since the February 2013 Additional Budget Estimates.
1575. Yes.
- APRA monitors internet traffic, including the use of social media sites. Reports generated focus on data utilisation.
  - There has been no change to APRA's protocols since the February 2013 Additional Budget Estimates due to staff usage.
  - APRA's existing protocols cover staff usage of social media. While there are no plans at present to change these protocols, APRA continually monitors usage in this area and will address changes as needs arise.
1576. APRA staff have been provided with access to social media to assist them to be more productive given increased use of social media by APRA-regulated entities and government agencies. Employee access to the internet, including social media, is governed by APRA's acceptable use policies and APRA expects personal use to be limited. APRA's managers are required to monitor and assess the performance of staff on an ongoing basis and use the performance management framework to address any performance issues including staff productivity.
