It is assumed that the “rating” referred to in the question is the National Australian Built Environment Rating System (NABERS). Energy efficiency audits do not, as a general rule, provide formal NABERS Energy ratings. However, Centrelink undertakes a ‘self-assessment’ NABERS Energy Rating of each premises within its leased portfolio in order to establish a ‘whole of portfolio’ rating; the current rating is 3.5 Stars, which under NABERS is considered very good to excellent regarding energy performance. Given the recent integration of portfolio enabling services within the Department of Human Services, this self-assessment rating process will be extended across the whole property portfolio in future years.

Energy audits within the leased property portfolio primarily identify site specific opportunities to reduce energy consumption. A cost-benefit analysis of each initiative is undertaken prior to potential introduction. The analysis considers related factors, such as remaining lease term, payback on investment, availability of funds, age and condition of the building, and anticipated future business requirements.

Energy conservation measures are tailored to each individual site, but typically comprise one or more of the following:

- refurbishment of existing light fittings to facilitate a reduction in the number of fluorescent tubes (e.g. two tubes down to one)
- replacement of light fittings with new energy efficient, usually single tube, fittings
- replacement of diachronic down lights with lower wattage alternatives
- installation of timers on lighting circuits
- linking lighting and/or air conditioning to the office security and/or building management system, so that when the last employee leaves and arms the relevant system, energy intensive services or equipment is switched off
- use of timers on lighting and/or air conditioning units, and
- use of sensors within ancillary accommodation areas, external and carpark lighting.
