

Do nothing in Australia - it is a waste of our resources and we will have a close to NIL effect on global CO2 omissions. It would be much better to either pay +$1 billion dollars to local authorities in the Amazon and get them to offer bonus payments to loggers to STOP tree cutting or subsidize electric car manufacturers in China/India so their growing middle class will be able to make a green motor vehicle purchase at a very low cost.

We could also look at replacing all Australia's coal fired power stations with nuclear power stations over the next 10-30 years. We should consider helping other nations as well as Australia electricity generators too phase out coal fired power stations and go nuclear. I know waste disposal is a huge issue but it is not as important or as time pressing as global warming. Rapid climate warming is a reality and we must hit the top mitigation areas first - which is tree clearing and power station emissions - all other emissions targeting is pointless!

Any other suggestions about a carbon tax, our climate change targets - are a complete waste of time and money and energy and will do ABSOLUTELY NOTHING to lower global CO2 levels.

Wake up Australia.

Robert Lengyel
Bachelor of Economics
Master of Science in Environmental Studies

PS. I am happy to debate these points with any so called Greenie, politician, and climate change expert - anywhere anytime!