

Scene of beauty ruined by ranger

Recently one afternoon my partner and I were walking on the beach in front of Happy Valley on Fraser Island.

As we walked we came across a dingo unearthing a cache of buried fish and sharing them with two big sea eagles and the brahminy kite. We were in awe of their beauty and respect for one another.

We must have watched for a good twenty minutes when along came a Queensland Parks and Wildlife ranger. He drove straight at the dingo and chased it up into the fore dunes in front of Second Valley.

The ranger then waited on the beach in case the dingo returned. After about four minutes he drove away - but the beauty that we had watched was destroyed.

Much to our amazement the dingo returned and the harmony was restored. Ten minutes later the same ranger arrived again and chased the dingo not towards Second Valley but into the township of Happy Valley.

Is this how the rangers are recording the dingo incidents in the townships?

I think this dingo will certainly now be marked for destruction. -

Hervey Bay's waters, at hand

The council own and manage our airports and could stop the a heart beat and restore the possible flight path that existed before last March and which been promised to Booral residents by the previous council.

It seems that no consultation was sought nor environmental impact considered for this important change.

Now the council is preparing to invite into the Fraser Coast a flight training school. How much destruction of the amenity of environment can we withstand before the tourism industry? Beauty and serenity is (or was) Hervey Bay's number one asset.

The short-term sell out for the benefit of a few will leave a lot of depressed property value, wrecked eco-tourism and the
