

The means test is totally missing the point of the exercise.

What we need is non-fossil fuel power and we need it as quick as possible.

To achieve this we need as many people to take up the offer as possible no matter what income level.

If some people in government are so ideologically apposed to wealthy people getting a rebate then I would suggest a compromise.

If you would fail the means test then you can still get the full rebate if you match dollar for dollar. That way the government can leverage community capital and still achieve the maximum green energy target.

In fact they would then get twice as much for their dollar from people that would otherwise currently fail the means test.

Regards

Dougal Plummer B.E (hons)

Plummer Software