

To Whom It May Concern,

As I have read all the other submissions, I will not regurgitate the same information. A point that hasn't been brought up to much is that of the Australian workers working for a foreign company like myself. If I was to start paying Australian tax, what benefits or what powers will the Australian government have over these companies to be able to make these companies comply with Australian employment laws. I mean this is why we pay taxes isn't in this country to receive all the sort of benefits. I have been working overseas for sometime now. I have had the rough end of the stick from a few companies, I don't whinge I don't start contacting the government etc. I realise that I am on my own and hence why the remuneration reflects this to cover these losses that we would normally get in Australia. I.e Super, redundances, unfair dismissal. To me the government is loing at the pure fiscal side, which I believe from other submissions is fa off the mark, but forgetting the moral obligation to an Australian taxpayer who votes them in or OUT.

Kind Regards,

Jeremy O'Brien
