

Redefining Marriage - Why?

Marriage is a union between a man and a woman. Very simply, that is what marriage means. Trying to transform it to mean something else is like trying to make people call an apple an orange instead. You can call it an orange, but it will still be an apple.

There is nothing to stop people from having other kinds of relationships. Everyone should have the right to choose however they want to live their lives, and no one should be looked down upon for it. But to try and call a homosexual relationship 'marriage' is simply mislabeling.

What's next? Perhaps a group of people who enjoy having sex together will want to be called 'married'. Why stop at marriage needing to be between only two people? After all, some people prefer to live that way, so shouldn't that be accepted also by expanding the term further? After that, what about those who prefer bestiality?

It's a slippery slope to start down to be certain. Marriage is an ancient and, to many people, sacred tradition. It is the cornerstone of strong families in today's age where strong family units are becoming all too rare. Let's not further muddy the waters by trying to call something what it isn't.
